Dow Jones Training Services Sends Customers to ONLC Training Centers After Closing its Training Facility

Princeton, New Jersey — October 25, 2005 — After closing their doors, Dow Jones Training Services has announced they are referring all of their training business to their preferred training provider, ONLC Training Centers. Dow Jones Training Services discontinued their publicly scheduled training programs and course offerings, and has established a partnership with ONLC to help facilitate their customers' transitions to a new training provider.

ONLC Training Centers Named Preferred Training Provider

According to a letter sent to Dow Jones training customers by Cheryl D. Badger, Director of Technical Training at Dow Jones, "The group is committed to transitioning our customers to new solution providers, testing centers, and reputable training organizations." Badger listed ONLC Training Centers as her company's preferred training provider and her first choice to aid customers in the transition.

Reputation in the Industry

"The referral shows that Dow Jones has a high level of confidence in our ability to deliver quality training to their clients," said Andy Williamson, CEO of ONLC Training Centers. "They selected us over several other vendors because of our great reputation in the industry. They were also impressed by our large number of regional locations, our low cancellation rate, and our ability to offer innovative delivery solutions such as RCI."

Students Make a Smooth Transition

According to Sean McSorley, New Jersey Sales Representative for ONLC Training Centers, the transition for Dow Jones customers to ONLC Training Centers has been a smooth one. "We have already done business with many of their clients, and we expect to do even more next year," McSorley said. "All in all, the transition has worked out seamlessly and easily for both our company and our new customers."
